

Understanding the NAPLAN test scores

PARENTS' GUIDE

The Canberra Times is publishing the literacy and numeracy scores of every ACT school included in the test results, along with how they compare to the national average. NSW laws mean we are not allowed to publish details of schools in that state.

The scores come from the National Assessment Program – Literacy and Numeracy, or NAPLAN, and are broken down by year and by subject, showing that schools perform better in some areas than others.

However, readers should treat rankings with caution as the top score does not necessarily mean that school has provided the best education.

Each student comes to school with different abilities, and authorities have tried to measure this through the Index of Community Socio-Educational Advantage or ICSEA. Readers should compare a school's NAPLAN rankings with its ICSEA index. The index combines information about parents, including their jobs and education, and combines it with census information to determine how advantaged a child is.

The higher the index, the better the school should be expected to perform.

For example, most of the independent schools in Canberra generally do better than the national average on their results, but their performance can slip down the table when the advantage of the schools' pupils is taken into account and they are compared with schools with similar advantage.

Conversely, some of the government schools which are found to be at or below the national average, often find themselves at the top of the league table when they are compared with schools with similar levels of disadvantage.

It could therefore be argued that a school with a low ICSEA score which does better than other similar schools provides a value-added education for its students when compared with a high ICSEA scoring school which does not keep up with other advantaged schools.

In Friday's Canberra Times we published the rankings and scores of ACT schools broken down into five categories: reading; writing; spelling; grammar and punctuation and numeracy.

In Saturday's Canberra Times, we publish separate tables of which ACT schools are punching above their weight by performing significantly better than similar schools.

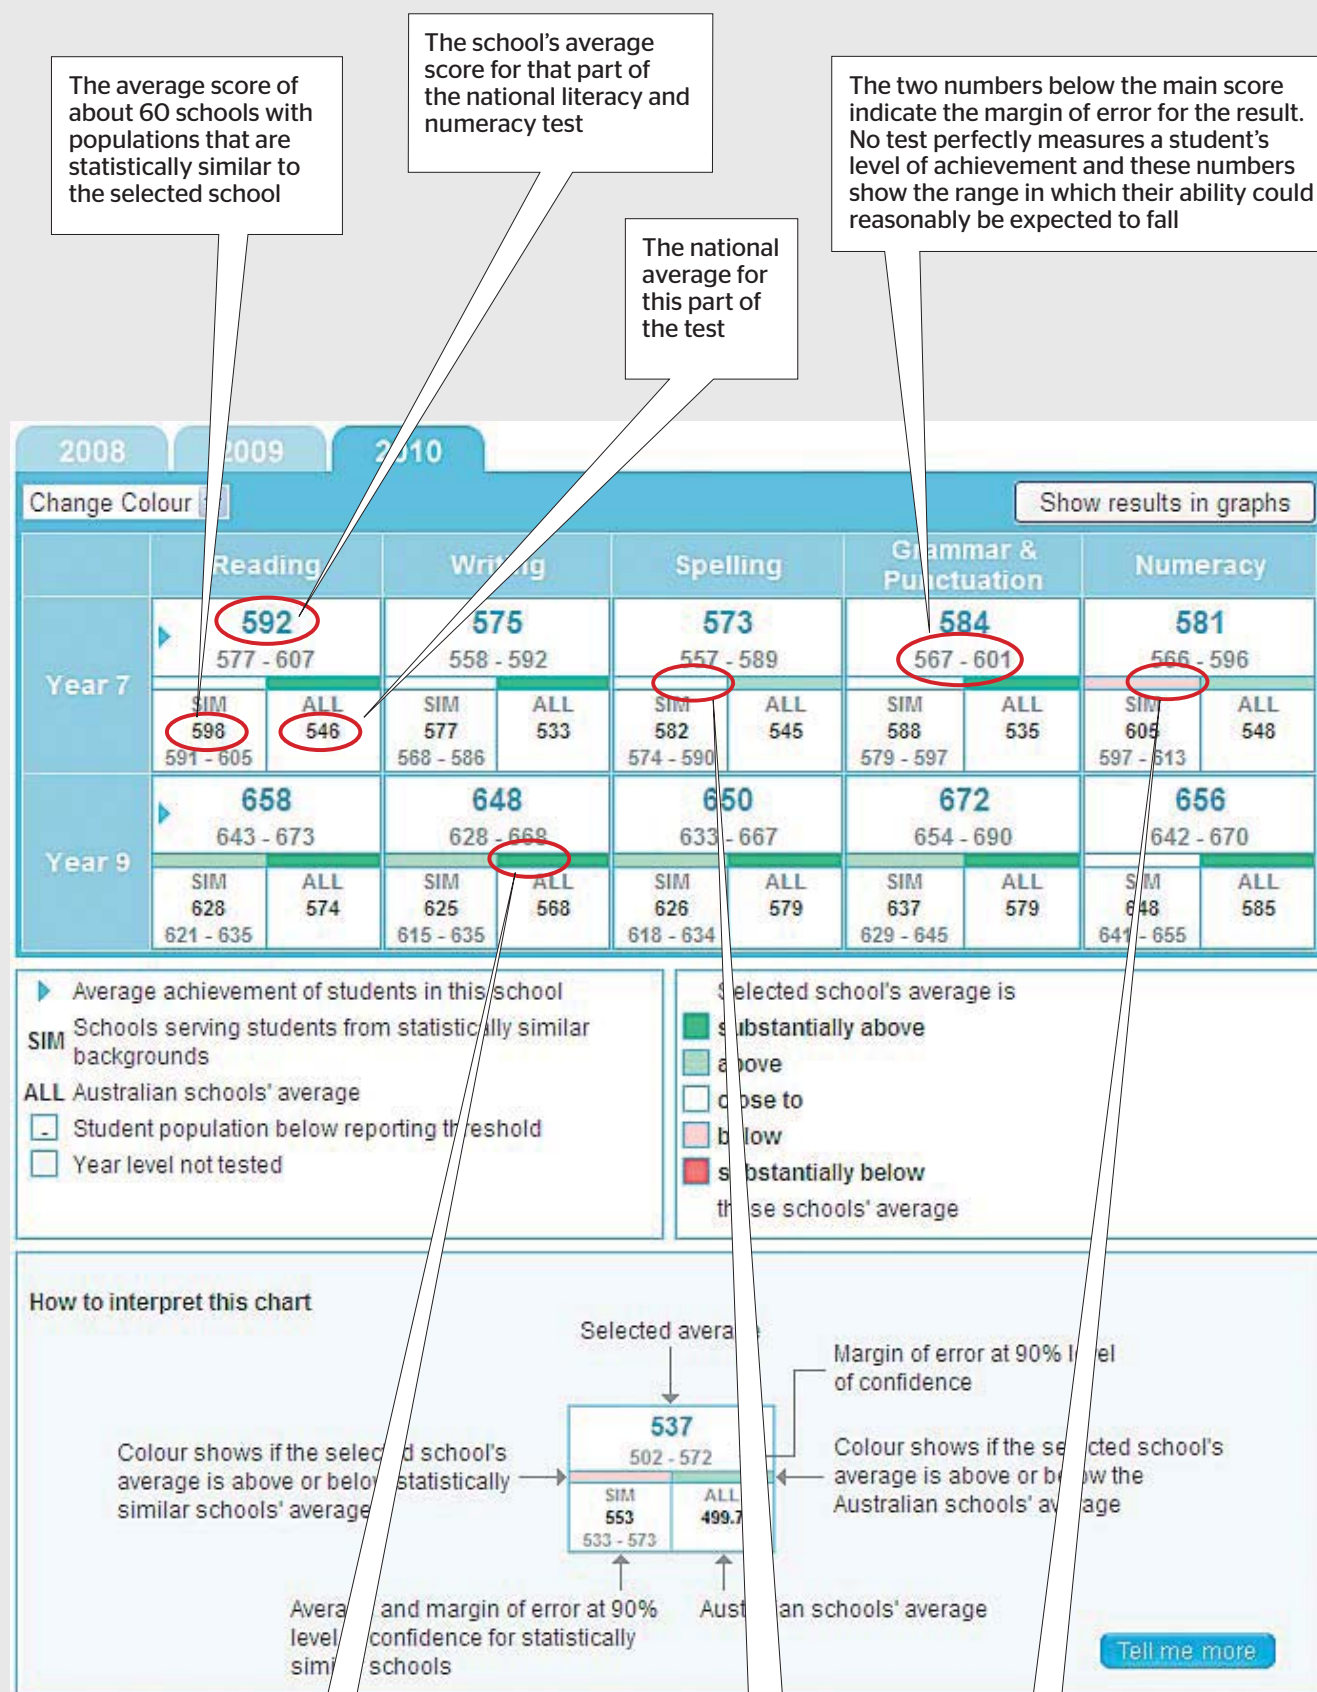

Meanwhile, more information on how each school performed in comparison to the 60 most-similar schools in the country is available on the My School website – www.myschool.edu.au.

Almost 10,000 schools can be found on the website by their name, suburb, town or postcode.

Each school has its own set of pages including basic data about the school, such as the range of years taught, number of students, attendance rates, number of teachers and percentage of indigenous students and of those who speak English as a second language. The school's National Assessment Program – Literacy and Numeracy results for years 3, 5, 7 and 9 are broken down into the categories of reading, writing, spelling, grammar and punctuation and numeracy.

These are the results that have been reproduced in The Canberra Times.
